0.2 Business Objective

We want to build a model that helps to identify via tweets whether there was a positive, negative or neutral sentiment in the message, either towards a brand or a product/app. The dataset we are using focuses on 9000 different tweets that happened during SXSW event and has four different options of sentiment these are: - Positive - Negative - Neutral/neither positive nor negative - I can't tell

0.3 Data Understanding

The dataset comes from CrowdFlower via data.worldLinks. Human raters rated the sentiment in over 9,000 Tweets as positive, negative, or neither, which can be found in tweets_dataset.csv in the data folder in this repository. The dataset includes 9,092 entries, and 3 columns. Here are the columns in the dataset including our target variable, sentiment

- tweet_text - The column contains the contents of the tweet that was captured
- emotion_in_tweet_is_directed_at - This column identifies whether the tweet was targeted to a brand or a specific product. There are a lot of NULL values in this column, so it's not super helpful initially
- is_there_an_emotion_directed_at_a_brand_or_product - This column helps to identify the sentiment of the tweet

0.7 Text Pre-Processing

In order to improve performance we want to complete the following steps to help reduce/remove the noise from the messy text data. These steps are: - Step 1: Tokenize all tweets - Step 2: Lower case all tokens - Step 3: Remove all punctuation - Step 4: Remove @mentions - Step 5: `html.unescape(text)` to remove HTML parsing - Step 6: Remove urls - Step 7: Remove all non `ascii` characters - Step 8: Split attached words - Step 9: Remove common words related to the event itself such as `sxsw` - Step 10: Standardise words (if they use too many letters) - Step 11: Stem/lemmatise words

This will then allow us to fit out models with a cleaner, hopefully more robust dataset.

0.11 Model Evaluation

After evaluating several different transformations and models, with a focus on optimising towards our recall score, we are getting varied results, this could be due to several reasons, however the main one to call out is the fact that the initial dataset is heavily imbalanced towards the neutral tweet compared to the negative sentiment tweets. As a result on all of the models trialled the negative sentiment category always had the lowest results.

The best performing model on both occasions has been the `CountVectorizer Multinomial Naive Bayes` model

0.12 Future steps & Limitations

In order to further refine the model in the future, the following limitations need to be addressed:

- Collect more data that allows the class imbalance between categories to be more balanced

Improvements could be made by switching approach from trialling out supervised ML models such as logistic regression, RandomForest and Multinomial Naive Bayes. Instead it is worth testing out a CNN approach using more advanced techniques such as gensim, GloVe and Word2Vec to help us the hidden layer inside the neural networks to better make the connection between the context of the tweet and the overall sentiment
